

Acknowledgements

The Fiscal Policy Institute is pleased to be able to make this second report on the State of Working New York available to all whose efforts will benefit from having easier access to this trove of information and analysis on the nature of New York's workforce and the changes that have occurred in the well-being of New York families over the past decade. The publication of this post-September 11, revised edition of The State of Working New York 2001 comes at a time of great uncertainty in predicting how New York's economy is likely to evolve over the coming months, years and decades. This report, however, makes clear how we got to where we were before September 11, 2001; it incorporates estimates of job losses associated with the horrific events of that date; and, it will hopefully serve as a useful source of information and analysis for those working to develop and implement plans for the making of a better New York.

The authors of this report — James Parrott, Zofia Nowakowski, Moshe Adler, David Dyssegaard Kallick and Oliver Cooke — worked long and tirelessly in preparing, revising and refining this report. By compiling and analyzing the wide range of data on which this report is based and by presenting their results in an accessible reference document, they are providing an extremely useful resource for those who want to ensure that economic policymaking in New York is based on the most accurate understanding possible of all the relevant information.

This report would not have been possible without the assistance of the Economic Policy Institute (EPI), particularly its Vice President, Larry Mishel, economists Jared Bernstein, Edie Rasell and Heather Boushey, and Research Fellow Bethney Gundersen. EPI provided much of the data on family income, hourly earnings and related areas used to prepare this report.

The assistance of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities also has been essential to this project. We benefited from a very careful review of a draft of this report by Iris Lav, the Center's Deputy Director, and from the constant advice and assistance of Liz McNichol who directs the Center's State Fiscal Project. The State Fiscal Project serves as a tremendous source of information for the Fiscal Policy Institute and the other state-level organizations that comprise the State Fiscal Analysis Initiative.

We are most appreciative of the helpful feedback provided by the members of FPI's Economic Advisory Committee and its Policy Board on the draft of this report, especially Mark Levinson, Mark Levitan, Len Rodberg, Tom Michl, John Mollenkopf, Gregory DeFreitas, Walter Stafford, Ken Peres, Joe Jamison, Iris Lav, Deborah Bell, Robert Lowry and Marc Granowitter. Rae Rosen of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York also provided helpful suggestions.

The staffs of the New York State Department of Labor and the U.S. Bureau of the Census graciously fielded numerous requests for data and technical assistance. Several people generously shared data with us for use in this report, including Michael Jacobs of the New York City Independent Budget Office, Michael Brisson of the New York State Comptroller's Office, Robert Lerman of the Urban Institute, Michelle Lewis and Ann Kempinski of AFSCME, and Joel Shufro and Jonathan Bennett of the New York Committee on Occupational Safety and Health. We would also like to acknowledge Diana Pearce and Jennifer Brooks for their work in preparing the Self-Sufficiency Standard budgets for New York counties.

Yahonnes Cleary provided research assistance at a critical stage in the preparation of this report. Cristina DiMeo of the Federation of Protestant Welfare Agencies and Bich Ha Pham of the Hunger Action Network of New York State provided expert assistance for the section on welfare reform.

Mark Levinson of UNITE, Ed Ott of the New York City Central Labor Council, Joe Jamison of the New York State AFL-CIO and Joe McDermott of the Consortium for Worker Education have been helpful on numerous projects that were drawn upon in one way or another in compiling this report.

Trudi Renwick of FPI's Albany staff assisted on many fronts, particularly welfare reform and the family self-sufficiency budgets. We are especially indebted to Margarita Aguilar for her superb design and layout of the report and its cover.

We are most grateful to CSEA and its President, Danny Donohue, for printing the final version of this report.

We also wish to acknowledge the support of the Rockefeller Foundation, the Ford Foundation, the Charles Stewart Mott Foundation, the Charles Revson Foundation, the Open Society Institute and the New York State AFL-CIO and many of its member unions, and to thank the many religious, human services, community and other organizations that support, disseminate and promote the Fiscal Policy Institute's analytical work.

Frank Mauro, Executive Director